the 1990s, the number of people with a diagnosis of schizophrenia has increased in many countries (Murray & Lewis 1991; World Health Organization 1993). This increase has been attributed to a number of factors, including changes in diagnostic criteria, changes in the way that mental health services are organized, and changes in the way that mental health problems are perceived and reported (Murray & Lewis 1991; World Health Organization 1993).

One of the most important factors in the increase in the number of people with a diagnosis of schizophrenia is the change in the way that mental health services are organized. In the 1950s, mental health services were primarily provided in large, institutional hospitals. In the 1960s and 1970s, there was a movement towards community-based mental health services. This movement was based on the idea that people with mental health problems should be treated in their own communities, rather than in large, institutional hospitals (Murray & Lewis 1991; World Health Organization 1993).

One of the reasons for the movement towards community-based mental health services was the belief that people with mental health problems would be better served by living in their own communities. This belief was based on the idea that people with mental health problems would be able to live more normal lives if they were treated in their own communities. This idea was based on the work of people like Erving Goffman (1961) and Thomas Szasz (1962), who argued that people with mental health problems should be treated as ordinary people, rather than as patients in a hospital (Murray & Lewis 1991; World Health Organization 1993).
